

Fleshing Out the Stories

Okay, you've shown the students how to make a story quickly, and fun, using a few basic steps, and/or asking fun questions. Now, get them to put THREE emotions into their story. They will be proud when they do!

For an example, I will go back to the Imagine If I had a Superpower idea. We take a simple, silly idea, and give it some heart.

It doesn't have to be fantasy. You can use this for ANY topic!

1. Introduce yourself/your character
2. Present a problem.
3. Show some emotion.
4. Overcome problem.
5. More emotion. Finish.

Superfart

Introduce Alex, shy, quiet kid.

Sad, because when the bully picks on friends, Alex is not brave enough to stop him.

Alex gets super powers (e.g. from, magic can of fried beans).

Tries to fight super villains, (e.g. Mr Homework, Captain Wedgie, etc...)

Alex's only real power is flying (e.g. when he does a superfart).

Hopeless superhero.

Alex feels lonely/embarrassed/defeated.

Alex goes back to school. He discovers while playing football he can use his super powers to help his friends. (Fart on opponents, make them drop the ball)

He uses his superpower to help scare off the bully.

Alex is happy because he was a lousy super hero, but great at helping his friends.

(Superhero of the school yard.)

End.
